Continued rapid progress is occurring in lung regenerative bioengineering and medicine. This includes increasing understanding of the role of endogenous lung progenitor cells, use of exogenous cells for cell-based therapies, and in bioengineering approaches targeting development of functional lung tissue or adjunct devices for clinical use. A survey of recent developments along with consideration of stem cell medical tourism for lung diseases will be presented.